COOL NIGHTS HOLD BACK CROP GROWTH

Roads and bridges have been damaged by the flood waters of mountain streams as the result of the warm days of the last week, according to the weather, crop and range bulletin for Utah, issued by the Salt Lake weather bureau. Cool nights have continued to retard crop growth. The planting of sugar beets, potatoes, and other truck is nearly completed.

High winds have depleted the moisture in the farm soils and rains would be helpful in many places. Fruit is developing slowly but satisfactorily. Livestock and the ranges are in good condition.

The beet fields were dried out somewhat by wind in the Cache valley, though other crops are doing fairly well, about one-half the beets in the Cornish district are still unplanted because of the late spring season. Sugar beets in the Garland district are reported to show about 90 per cent stand; rain would do much good right now, potatoes, peas and beans are coming up nicely. Early potatoes are coming up at Brigham City, but late plantings have just been completed. Favorable weather for potatoes and other truck is reported from the Ogden and Morgan districts.

Cool nights have retarded crop growth in the Salt Lake valley, and strong winds have dried out the soils and done some slight damage to spring grains and other crops. Fruits are doing fairly well, and it is apparent that little winter injury has occurred generally. Cool nights and a late season, on the whole, have been rather unfavorable for beets, potatoes, and other truck in Utah county, though condition of these crops is fairly good. Warm days in the Sanpete and Sevier valleys have increased stream flow and some farm lands have been flooded; ranges are in fair condition. High winds did some damage at Desert. The Colorado river at Moab is six inches above the former highest stage.
